The year was...

For most Americans living today, the year 1963 will forever be associated with the assassination of President John F. Kennedy. Almost everyone of a certain age has indelible memories of that tragic event; and the endless repetition throughout the subsequent years of its images ensures that many who don’t actually remember will never forget.

But a great deal more happened in 1963 besides one terrible turning point; after all, the shooting on November 24 was preceded by almost eleven months of history. During that time, Pope John XXIII died. Surgeon Michael E. DeBakey performed the first artificial heart implant into a human being. The Supreme Court ruled that public schools might no longer require the recitation of the Lord’s Prayer or Bible verses. Betty Friedan published The Feminine Mystique, and the Beatles had their first US hit with “I Wanna Hold Your Hand.”

The data for 1963 present, in their aggregation, a rather grim and brooding aspect. Americans, in general, were preoccupied with the Cold War and the very real possibility of nuclear conflict. Black Americans, in particular, sat on the cusp of great change as the murder of Medgar Evans, the bombing deaths of four young girls attending Sunday school in Alabama, and the eruption of riots in Birmingham raised the intensity of the young civil rights movement.

The high point of the latter was, of course, the August 28 March on Washington, where some 250,000 people listened to Martin Luther King, Jr., proclaim his vision for the future. As King gazed out at them from the steps of the Lincoln Memorial, one dream was beginning.

On the streets of Dallas three months later, another dream met its end.
