We commit some of our gravest injustices when we make broad, sweeping generalizations—especially disparaging ones—about entire groups of people. This is a bad habit that our society has, to a large extent, outgrown. Most of us no longer find it acceptable to characterize whole races or genders or ethnic groups in this manner.

Why, then, do we persist in taking such an approach to our young people?

American adults tend to treat youth as a problem. In an April 2000 Fox News poll, for instance, no less than 80% said that the way children behave today is strongly or somewhat indicative that the country is in the midst of a moral crisis. A search of the Roper Center’s iPoll database reveals 2,046 survey questions that were asked about youth in the last five years. This number falls by more than half if questions having to do with alcohol, narcotics, sex, crime, death, and problems in general are eliminated from the search results—and this does not even take into account all the negative items that are classified under other topic areas, such as family, television or values.

Of course, like everyone else, American adolescents do have, and make, problems. As the data on the following pages show, most high school seniors themselves say that growing up is harder today than it was when their parents were kids, and parents overwhelmingly agree that their teens face more problems than they did at the same age. Shockingly large proportions of high school seniors say they have peers who have gotten pregnant or attempted suicide, and four in ten have already had to face a serious life crisis. Yet nearly 80% feel that their lives so far have been no harder than most others their own age.

But this is far from being the whole story. The one thing that shines forth from these data more clearly than anything else is the complexity of these adults-in-the-making, and the things they think and the things they do. Far from fitting the stereotype of rebellious, disaffected teenagers, for instance, 85% of high school seniors rate their relationships with their parents as excellent or good; 92% percent say their parents are people they look up to or want to be like.

While many 12 to 17 year olds are preoccupied with their friends, their jobs, and other activities, the thing the majority is most likely to do after school each day is just to go home. Two-thirds of high school seniors do volunteer work, even though only 23% are required by their schools to do so. And although many 13 to 19 year olds say they feel peer pressure to use drugs, have sex, or grow up too fast, they aren’t troubled by it nearly as much as their parents think they are.

How can we hope to capture in any single sketch the many faces of youth? Even if it were possible to do so, it wouldn’t be fair. As the data here show, our young people are multidimensional beings who defy oversimplification, and people in their own right—just like their elders.
