In 1939, the Roper Organization conducted a commercial survey of 3,157 respondents between the ages of 10 and 19, aimed, apparently, at assessing the market for tea among young people.

It is our great good fortune that in the effort to get to know their potential customers, the survey sponsor, a now-obscure (and presumably defunct) entity called the “Tea Bureau,” commissioned a number of questions that help us, 62 years later, get to know them as well.

This is not to say we are given any more than a glimpse. Sticking mostly to the obvious and innocuous, the pollsters did not attempt to elicit information from their youthful respondents about anything much more serious than what they did to annoy their parents, and vice versa. Perhaps at that time it did not occur to them to do so; the problems of adolescence were not something people seemed to give much thought to in the 1930s.

Yet this particular generation of teens and preteens had everything to be serious about. Children of an economic depression from which their country was still struggling to emerge, teetering on the brink of the most destructive war the world has thus far known, they spoke in the survey of simple pleasures from a past that for many must have been bleak, and dreamed of hopeful futures which many would never see— not, at least, in the way they’d dreamed them.

Today, all of the participants in the Tea Bureau survey are either deceased or getting quite old. Based on these meager data, can we compare their former selves with our own youth, whose problems and pleasures are so different? Probably not; but as we tally the percentages of their responses and read the open-ended remarks represented here, we might at least pick up some faint echo of what it was like back then to be young.
