The Drug Issue in Campaign ‘96

Editor’s Note: Two reports on use of illicit drugs, especially by teenagers, that were released this summer have helped push the issue more centrally into the presidential campaign. One of these studies is the annual “Household Survey on Drug Abuse (HSDA),” sponsored by the Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration. The National Opinion Research Center (NORC) did the fieldwork for this study. It was the 1995 survey results that were just released. The other report was based on a national survey of teenagers and a parallel survey of their parents, conducted in June of 1996 by Luntz Research Companies for the National Center on Addiction and Substance Abuse (NCASA), Columbia University.

The findings of surveys of teens’ experience with drugs need to be approached with significant skepticism. This is especially so when it’s the individuals’ own use of illicit drugs that’s being explored. Recognizing this, the Columbia University survey asks teens only about what they see around them, not whether they personally have used drugs.

Nonetheless, these two new studies document that Americans’ experience with illicit drugs remains all too extensive and that drug abuse is recognized as a very serious problem. The Household Survey on Drug Abuse suggests that teens’ use of marijuana and other illicit drugs has been increasing over the past several years.
